Integrated care - role in medical education 1st experience with implementation in a running curriculum

Liesbeth Borgermans

Huisartsgeneeskunde, Vrije Universiteit Brussel, Belgium

Liesbeth.Borgermans@vub.ac.be

Integrated and person-centered care are considered an essential response to the challenges Europe’s health and social security systems are facing: an ageing population and an increase of multi-morbidity. Despite there is no universally accepted definition of integrated and person-centered care, there is growing insight to the essential components of both inter-related concepts and their effectiveness on multiple outcomes of care. A better understanding of person-centered and integrated care is essential to the medical curriculum and post-graduate training of medical doctors.